A BLOW TO FISHERMEN.

Recent Gale Has Deprived Many of Work Until Next May.

North Truro, Mass., Nov. 15.—The westerly gale which recently swept over the New England coast produced results the seriousness of which are just becoming evident. The great fish weir industry around Cape Cod has been completely wiped out, so far as a continuance of the present season's work is concerned. Poles and nets have been washed away and destroyed, boats have sunk, and the disaster will be keenly felt. The weirmen had hoped to pull out a very unsatisfactory season's fishing by the late run of mackerel and herring. Not only have they lost all possibility of a further increase of their scanty savings of money, but their gear has been irreparably injured.

Scores of men, most of them with families, will be thrown out of employment until the beginning of another fishing season, about May 1.

The destruction of the nets and poles, coming so late in the season, precludes the possibility of any resumption of the business this fall. Cold storage and canning plants, which at this season of the year are usually doing a lively business, are preparing to close down.

These weirs and their accessories represent a capital of more than $150,000, and the employment of 100 men. The present is the worst disaster which has befallen them since their inception in these waters, in 1882.
