TRAWLERS IN THE ICE.

Provincetown Harbor Has Worst Ice Embargo Since 1857.

Fifty-Two Vessels Seek Protection Alongside of Wharves.

Since Tuesday morning Provincetown's harbor mouth has been choked by ice, preventing vessels from entering or leaving harbor. The Boston trawler Ida S. Brooks made an effort to escape to the open sea, but got only as far as Long Point End and was driven back.

The blockade found a dozen big trawl schooners in port. Of these schs. Rose Cabral, Ida S. Brooks, William A. Morse, Philip P. Manta, Glenelg and Sea Fox abandoned anchorage in mid-harbor Tuesday forenoon and docked at the old steamboat pier to better withstand the buffets of the floe, which was almost inpenetrable, crowding inward, and the Nellie Adams, Governor Russell, Esther Gray, I. J. Merritt and Harvester sought refuge at Railroad wharf, while every one of the 52 sloops and schooners ran in beside shorter wharves.

Only two big craft remained at anchor, the Boston trawler Mattie D. Brundage, and the lumber coaster C. W. Dexter. The craft named are securely penned in port pending the retreat of the floe, which filled the harbor and extended in an unbroken field for miles south of Long Point, with a frontage of at least four miles.

The Brundage hung to her anchors until the head of the floe slowly moving toward the west end of the harbor, had enveloped her, when her anchors were hove short, her foresail and jibs were rattling aloft, and the craft was extricated from the thin ice bordering the field and run in alongside of Matheson's wharf where the crafts are lying in double lines.
