Maine Sardines.

The fact that this is a very poor season for sardine catching along the coast makes it thus far impossible to judge accurately of the new sardine packing inspection law that was enacted by the 1929 legislature and has been in effect since April.

The state commissioner of Agriculture, under whose authority administration the sardine law has been placed, said that his department has met many difficulties in putting the new service into effect chiefly from the fact that it must, under the law, be self-supporting, depending upon a fee of one cent per case levied on sardines shipped out from each factory.

"Thus far," said Commissioner Washburn, "the season of 1929 has been a poor one in the sardine industry. Only scattered catches have been reported and experienced canners state that never has the early season pack been smaller or more uncertain. This results in a very small income for the support of the inspection service.

"It is a fact, however, that the canners are themselves lending every effort to the help of this department and are sincerely cooperating to make the inspection effective. Undoubtedly a superior product will result."

The inspection of all sardine factories is mandatory under the provisions of the new law, and at the present time nine inspectors are engaged.

Quiet at New York.

There were no arrivals at Fulton Market, New York, this morning.

The fare of the Mary yesterday sold for 4 cents for haddock; 8 cents for cod; 10 cents for flounders and 8 cents for small flounders.
