LEFT GEAR ON FISHING BANKS

A howling northwest gale which reached a maximum velocity of 34 miles an hour at Portland yesterday, afternoon, forced the crew of the schooner Richard J. Nunan to leave 24 tubs of gear on the fishing banks and to seek shelter in port. The wind, one of the strongest to sweep over Portland in several weeks, was accompanied at sea by a blinding snowstorm.

All of the Nunan's 14 dories were away from the vessel when the storm broke, but Capt. Fred Thompson, rather than risk the lives of his crew in an attempt to haul in the gear, ordered the dories back to the schooner and when all hands were accounted for headed directly for port. Before leaving the banks, however, the Nunan's crew marked the location of the gear, and when the weather clears this morning again will head for the banks to pick it up and resume fishing.

Besides forcing the Nunan back into harbor ,the stiff northwest gale prevented several of the vessels of the Portland fishing fleet from leaving port.

Capt. James Bowie of sch. Agnes, reports speaking schs. Waldo L. Stream, Niagara and Preceptor on Green Bank recently.

The smelt season has struck Essex in good shape and today some good hauls were made at Essex river. E. O. Brown in his fish market here is displaying some which weigh half a pound.

COAST GUARD AIDS TRAWLER

The fishing trawler Cambridge became disabled two miles north, northeast of the Boston Lightship yesterday and was obliged to call on the Coast Guard for assistance. Within a short time after she wirelessed her position and declared that she required immediate assistance the patrol boat 171 on duty nearby was ordered to her and a tow was established at 6:45 last evening. An hour later the Coast Guard boat reported that it was towing the trawler to President Roads and proceeding easily. The conditions were comparatively good.

Struck Whistler

The auxiliary fishing schooner Waltham II of Boston struck the whistling buoy off Chatham yesterday, and was boarded by the Coast Guard crew from the Nauset station, who found that the vessel was leaking badly. The captain said he required no assistance and would try and make port at Boston. The vessel headed north, with her pumps working to keep her free of water.

Dragger Disabled

The fishing dragger Cambridge, formerly the Marieta B., while making a trial run, broke down off Boston lightship yesterday and was picked up by the Coast Guard patrol boat 171 and towed to President Roads, where she was turned over to the tug Sadie Ross, which towed her to the Atlantic Works, East Boston, for repairs. Several invited guests were on board the dragger at the time.
