

By Major A.H. Thiessen
Science Service Meteorologist

Amateur meteorologists! Weather as a hobby has an appeal for many people. They wish to observe the weather elements and make useful records. Amateurs may make useful and valuable contributions to meteorology as some do to astronomy. Observations of the weather to be of most use should fit in with those of the national services; that is, they should be taken the same time and the same way so they may be comparable with those taken the world over. Amateurs who wish to observe and record the weather elements should consult with their nearest professional. Local observations are needed and amateur weather observers may do much for the science by describing local phenomena, all of which may be done with a minimum of equipment. (Any Time Release)