

For Release
May 3, 1939

By Maj. A. H. Thiessen
Science Service Meteorologist

Fishing weather! What weather pleases a trout well enough to make him rise -- to make him reckless? There are so many weather factors to consider that it is only an acute fisherman-observer whose opinion is worthwhile. Many fishermen state that fishing is good when the wind is in the right direction, but the right wind seems to be different at different times and places. It appears that the opinion of most value states that trout rise best just after a storm has passed and the barometer is rising. Before a storm all nature is sluggish; a storm revives everything, churns the water, and the trout feel this awakening and recklessly rise to your flies.

*****