

For release                      By Major A.H. Thiessen
March 30, 1940      Science Service Meteorologist

Climate and man! It would seem that if one really knew what kind of climate would be most beneficial to one's own health or inclination such a climate could be found, because climatologists have classified the earth into micro-climates. Some have very cold winters and relatively hot summers; others have a change in temperature throughout the year of less than a degree. Some have much rain, while others are practically rainless. It is probable that many would select climates that would be suitable for nothing but repose. The monotony of some climates, which may from a distance seem delightful, is enervating to the body and deadly to the activity of the mind.

-----